HyperMotion Technology As you run, sprint, and kick to score moves in FIFA, you get more “feel” from the game by getting more accurate aim, intercepting passes, and being able to place strikes on goal. Speed and power are connected by physics: players sprint with more speed, tackle harder, score with more power, and more. The result is a game that gives more control to the players, and how they choose to play in a FIFA match. Movements and real game movements are fundamental to a satisfying experience playing on Xbox One X. HyperMotion Technology represents a powerful way to improve player movements in the game. This is a look at some of the things that HyperMotion Technology can do to improve the action and create a new dynamic in gameplay. AI Pressing a series of buttons (near the D-Pad, left stick, analog stick, or X-and Y-buttons) will activate a quick play option that prompts the player to work on the details. These details include gaining a better pass reception, a quick turn, or a better jump. For instance, the AI is able to read your movement, so it will come to you with a pass reception or a turn. It will adjust its positioning as you make moves. The AI itself is driven by the player animations, techniques, and the match performance. Here is an example: a player kicks the ball, and the AI will have the AI quickly react to that move by coming to pick up the ball and move the player to the next action needed (mid-air, hit it to score, etc.). Your line of vision is no longer a barrier for players. Passing and Balancing Offloads After a pass is made, the player will be able to choose from one of two options. One is to pass the ball out of bounds, and the other is to pass the ball to a teammate. The ability for players to decide for themselves to pass the ball out of bounds and call their teammates has opened up a new level of opportunities to play. When you have a pass to a teammate, you can now build up speed by offloading the ball. During offloads, you have the choice of creating space by jogging, turning to run, or just running and diving
